Learning and development (L&D) professionals perform in a variety of roles and responsibilities to develop individuals and teams to work more effectively and add significant value to the performance of their organisations.

The importance of the L&D profession has grown significantly in recent times, becoming more strategic at all executive levels, and increasingly proactive and innovative as a result of new challenges, methodologies, and technologies.

With this the expectations of clients and stakeholders have also shifted to ensure the L&D spend demonstrably contributes to achieving business goals and enhancing organisational performance.

As we know business markets change rapidly which means organisations need to adapt and become more agile and responsive to change which means employees need to be reskilled and upskilled faster to prepare for the future.

Well designed and facilitated training also provides organisations with a competitive advantage in attracting and retaining talent. Employees perform better and stay longer with organisations that have a strong learning culture, supporting employees for their current and future roles.

The pandemic has driven a great leap forward in digital learning, and dramatically changed the way learning and development is now done. Is there any point in looking back?

"Just wanted to say thank you for your time on Monday. I am reasonably new to the Learning and Development (L&D) space so I found the session extremely valuable and appreciate the access to the website and its associated knowledge base. To know that we are supported by an organisation with a professional reputation as highly regarded as ILP is so important to myself personally and the overarching L&D philosophies of Liberate Learning."

The Key to Success is Collaboration

For organisations of all types to achieve sustained success, collaboration is crucial, particularly in these changing times. Teamwork, cross-functional projects, and relationships across companies, where win-win opportunities are embraced, are the accepted strategic imperatives in today's business environment and is especially true for professional associations and institutes such as the Institute for Learning and Performance (ILP).

ILP has a history of partnering with our professional members, aligned associations and institutes, and a range of sponsoring partners. In continuing this strategy ILP is now seeking to form three types of relationships.

Learning Partners

Learning Partners Supporting Partners Partnerships between organisations with similar areas of focus, goals, and values have proven to be one of the most effective ways to increase brand awareness. And it generates customer interest through broader exposure to similar markets, fosters stakeholder loyalty as they receive added value, and influences trends and standards across the broader learning and development field.

By sharing ILP offerings with your stakeholders, and by sharing your unique offerings with ILP stakeholders the opportunity for mutual growth is significantly increased.

Supporting Partners

Having a supporting relationship with ILP demonstrates a commitment to professional development, learning transfer and innovation within the L&D community. As a Supporting Partners you will be respected and recognised for the investment you make into this key industry.

Sponsoring Partners

For organisations with products and services of potential interest to L&D professionals, independent trainers, performance coaches, learning designers, the benefits are significant as we expose you to our members, members of our Learning Partners, and to the broader L&D community through our many communication strategies.

Peak body, industry leader, trusted advisor

With over 14 years' experience, the Institute of Learning and Performance (ILP) is the peak body, industry leader, and trusted advisor supporting learning and development professionals of all types. We have developed a niche position within the industry, thanks to our concentration of focus, quality, and level of engagement with our members.

We support over 4000 members by working with them and creating opportunities to create success pathways for their careers or business and achieve the desired outcomes for the clients or organisations.

Focusing on long term success within the industry

ILP has developed an L&D Capability Framework that identifies the capabilities L&D professionals need now and into the future for long-term success within their profession and industry. By connecting and collaborating with partners and members of the learning and development community ILP is pioneering new standards for the learning and performance industry. And these are being deployed through ILP's ability to assess and benchmark individuals and organisations to these standards, and then guide them along a learning pathway raised through our range of professional certifications.

ILP's Purpose

To lead the learning evolution by raising and setting the standards for learning and development, so that organisations and learners see how excellence in learning will result in exceptional capability and enhanced performance.

A wide range of experienced learning and development professionals

Our community of members are committed to helping individuals and organisations enhance their performance, increase their capability, and navigate behavioural change. They are experienced learning and performance professionals, including learning designers, face-to-face and online facilitators, program leaders, performance coaches, training impact assessors, professional speakers, and registered training organisations.

They may be independent operators, small business owners, part of corporate learning and development teams, heads of departments and C-Suite executives in Human Resources and L&D and are generally characterised as decision-makers and influencers. Working in every type of industry, large and small organisations, in the public and private sectors they provide Instructor Led Training (ILT), Virtual Instructor Led Training (VILT), and leading-edge Online Training (ONT).

"At GMD Partnerships, we were looking for an organisation to align with who served the learning and development profession but who had a focus on performance rather than just learning. ILP met what we were looking for in name and action.

They promote lifelong learning, peer to peer support, provide resources and promote the need to deliver results for organisations through learning alignment rather than just delivering training/ learning. They have proven themselves an ideal organisation for us to work alongside and to support. They promote us to their membership and they seem to attract great members!

Every partner has their own unique needs

At ILP we understand that all partnerships are unique and important.

Partnerships of all types are vital to the success of any member organisations and provide massive value to everyone involved. We value our partner relationships, which is why we have created options that allow you to choose the relationship that will give you the benefits and returns you are looking for.

Learning Partners

Are association/organisations with a similar purpose and values to ILP, whereby working together, sharing reciprocal offerings and rights to benefit each other's stakeholders, and increased value to members. Our partnerships with AusAPT and the Learning & Performance Institute (UK) are a testament to this.

Supporting Partners

Are individuals or organisations who admire the ILP vision and mission, who want to be associated with what ILP is doing and understand the mutual value of that association.

Sponsoring Partners

Are organisations that have an offering (product/ service) of potential value to our members, and by extension to members of our Learning Partners. Sponsoring Partners are important to our members as they keep them current with the latest offerings they might use in developing and delivering high quality services.

A special relationship with our sponsors

Being an ILP Sponsoring Partner is one key ingredient to your success.

At ILP we understand our sponsoring partners have their own business growth strategies, and we want to understand them and be a valuable part of making those strategies successful, particularly the marketing strategies.

Marketing, as you know, can be a mysterious art and is very different to sales, and can serve many purposes including:

- providing information on your services, including any changes in what you are doing,
- creating engagement with potential customers,
- building your brand awareness, or your rebranding message,
- positioning your organisation in specific industries or demographics,
- boosting business growth, and/or maintaining customer loyalty,
- and of course promoting sales.

Partnering with ILP can support some or all of the above purposes as part of a marketing strategy.

And of course these connect together to drive success, for example building brand awareness, and positioning in the right market, may drive sales quickly, but are more likely to materialise down the line as the services provided are made more visible to potential clients.

It all depends on what our partners are trying to achieve. Our aim is to add a valuable component to our partner's growth success.

Let's talk. We can tailor a proposal for you

Businesses in the Asia Pacific region face the same challenges in terms of "Futureproofing" its workforce and this is where a partnership with ILP makes sound sense – not just in economic terms but also demonstrates your commitment to a common denominator and to be seen as a part of the solution.

A relationship with ILP will allow you to demonstrate your commitment to professional development, skills and innovation of services within the Learning and Development community. As one of our partners you will be respected and recognised for the investment that you make into this key industry.

In this unique time we live in every individual and organisation has experienced change like never before.

We look forward to hearing from you and welcome the opportunity to discuss in greater detail our partnership offers to confirm a mutually beneficial option.
